What? Remember Deep Dreams, the system based on artificial neural networks capable of reinterpreting our photos with a touch between witty and terrifying? Now we have a new algorithm, also built on a red neuronal, which can color photos in black and white with a result, sometimes capable of reaching the human eye. The algorithm, which currently has no name, is the work of a group of researchers from the University of Berkeley, in California, and has been trained with more than a million color images. Thanks to the information obtained from them, it is able to predict which chromatic values each element has in a black and white photo, and proceed to its coloring... with uneven results. In their research work (available in PDF here), the authors of the algorithm propose the objective of obtaining an automated image coloring system, which depends as little as possible on the interaction with the user and which produces results of vivid colors and, above all, realistic. As researchers explain, this new system is a big step forward in researching automatic image coloring - but there are still bugs with some of them. The problem is that the system has been trained with the huge ImageNet database, and it works well with similar images - but it can fail with other image types, in what they call the "data subject". Despite all, there were also high-quality results, which the authors of the research wanted to validate with a kind of "Test of Turing Coloring". To do this, he asked some volunteers to participate in the study to choose between an original image and one generated by the algorithm. Surprisingly, the system is awarded to 20% of the participants, making them believe that an image colored by the network was already in color in its origin. This result far exceeds that obtained by mafá © all of automatic color above. In addition, the training in database, the algorithm was also tested with images of well-known photographs, such as André Adams and Henri Cartier-Bresson. Regardless of the taste of each one, it must be said that the result is surprising in some cases. Colored imagines of Ansel Adams In addition to reading the complete study in PDF if you are interested in the topic, it is also possible and ready. The necessary condition is publication in GitHub, and requires a functional installation of the Caffe framework and some basic books of Python. GitHub's repository also includes all the necessary documentation.

It is more, if you dare and test it, you can share with the researcher the results of your experiments with the coloring Link | Colorful Image Colorization in GitHub | Demo Code in GitHub | This creates that artificial intelligence of Facebook Imagenes capaces de decir, it is based on one of the Nettter neuroscience illustrations, which are "3rd edition", which combines the wealth and beauty of the illustrations with the key information about the main regions and systems of the system of the brain © Falo, the Mafe © spinal and the periphery. This neuroscience notebook coloring is a "netter à € 6 à € 1". It is organized as follows: General visitor regional, general systems neurosciences Other parts were color, and new artists who drew the anatomy. And in the current Nettter that is a lot of books of the main anatomical schemes prepared. For many, it may seem dumb and waste time when performing this art of color if there are already books with colored images, but it should be stressed that this is a visual tact learning technique and its level is much higher than other study or learning strategies. Thus, this strategy of learning technique is not to prove to improve our knowledge, the issue of having benefits of the human brain.
